Royalty free photos

Stock and Micro stock is also known as Royalty free photos. And with the advent of digital has become very competitive as almost anybody can take a shot and post it to a site. But these Micro stock sites are very selective on what they take and will reject images. Some of the most popular and well trafficked sites are:

- Dreamstime
- Shutterstock
- Flickr/ GettyImages
- Alamy
- Do your research
- It's a numbers game the more you post the better your chances

I guess I can classify my photography as classical, but with a contemporary point of view. My photographs are highlighted by strong vivid colors and strong lights and dark's I am an Architect by profession but a photographer by passion. Now that I am 62 and semi-retired, I can now devote more time to my passion, photography.

My images has been in several publications including textbooks and magazines. My work has won several awards and has been selected 3 years in a row at the Ohio State Fair, and has been exhibited in several galleries.

My passion in photography started at a early age, and has continued to this day. Photography allows me to freely express myself, and share how I see the world. I graduated from Texas Tech University with a degree in Architecture, where I also studied photography and Art. Please e-mail me at dickw@wood-n-photography.com for any questions you might have. A case study on Society 6

Sales were slow at best so I did some research on what was selling, and found out from members of S6 that the site sells a ton of i-phone cases.

With still more research..

General tips

It takes hard work and will take some time. Research which type of site suits your style.

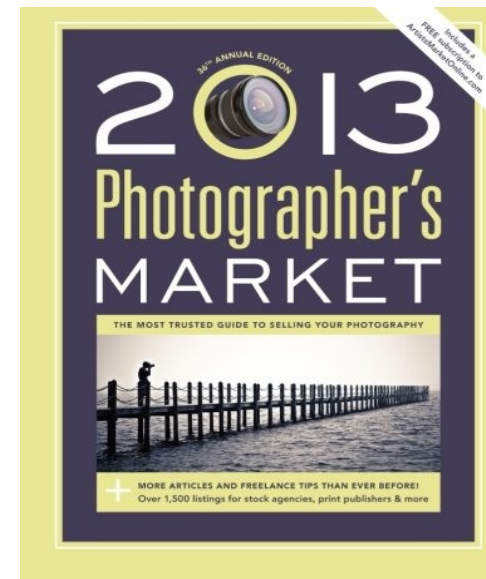

Tag all of your photos. Use descriptive names of files (not DCS123.jpg but Blue flower.jpg).

Make connections (post to facebook, flickr etc) If it can't be seen it can't be sold.

Get a flickr account, it's free for the first 200 files.

Download and use Google search by image.

Get the book 2013 Photographers Market
